Introduction

9/11 had changed the way government and law enforcement agencies deal with terror threats. These threats evolved over the years and shall continue to evolve in order to evade security detections, making an already difficult task more arduous for security agencies. Not only has 9/11 changed the way security is managed in the aviation domain, it had also changed the way security forces deal with terror-related activities and incidents. Security agencies have always played catch-up to terror groups and are constantly looking at ways to bridge the gap. The challenge here is; do we deal with it head-on with the use of force or do we look at other causes of terror-related activities such as social problems and use a softer approach to the problem?

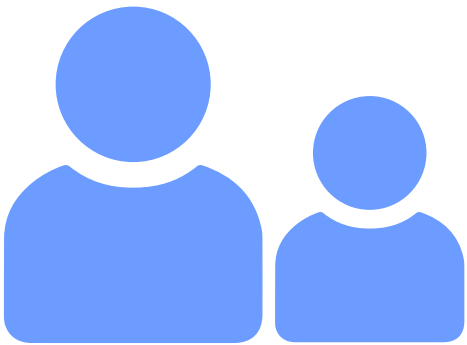

During this 2-days workshop, participants will gain an understanding of the definition of terrorism. Understanding the definition is crucial as it sets the tone for the formulation of security policies and framework subsequently. Participants will also analyse several measures and policies to counter threats arising from terrorism from several countries including Singapore. Participants will earn a deeper understanding of some of these threats such as the Lone Wolf phenomenon that have evolved over the years and the importance that any security measures remain relevant and effective to counter these threats.
